VOLUME VII. NEW SERIES.

AFFECTING POESY.

The Mt Vernon, Ohio Whig publishes a half column of verses, composed by one James Doll, as he says, "upon the Death of three young ladies who were drowned in Connecautte June the 24th 1849." We copy five of the stanzas, not venturing to give more, for fear that some of our fair readers may exact a like notice in expectation of a like obituary:—

James calls upon his readers to
Look out for Lord
Lucinda too, And Ester Elizabeth one
Instrument His name on he both
And first names of Doll.

He then proceeds to tell Parentheses:

In Sunday the twenty fourth of June
The Rivers running there in A
Treatment not With Gallantly
Both At month of connecautte
Town a resting there Were getting
Into Death At Grave you Rest
Two young Women But A new farewell
Is Said to Washington

In fact several had to take An A
Sacked to A Flood Which came on
Sweep to Rush resistless and so
After the Road the Road is Great the the Innocent child Cried
Not Were Accompanied With
The Rod Alapointed on the Bed

* * * * * * *

At the funeral—

Near a thousand souls Indignant public
There to attend the exercises had
Not Claiming Fare We were not
Sorrow Were Present Cause What
Check But the test of pity drive
To remind their parents Dear
Whose Bosom Cords are rent With
Grief and vital strings Do Dear

And James concludes:

Could my finger touch the mournful key
of the Good could Dare I pray me to the solemn Would Hear the Note than those they sung that
Day to Absolutions Resurrection they
Are Gone for sweeter notes to
Sing to sing Were they Here
And that lies no darning String

Their mournful friends they Gave for
Refined to See Rise from the Waves
And now the Bloom of the spring
Had Decs their peaceful Grave
Into the tide he Have found as fullest
Morning Rise to all For to stand reds and
Pray in Where every Death Death call

[From the National Intelligencer.]

The Youth of the Revolution.

In his speech delivered at the Acton celebration in Massachusetts, Oct. 22nd, Mr. Winthrop gave the following interesting account of an interview which he had with the late venerable John Quincy Adams, about five or six years ago:

"It was on the floor of the capitol, not far from the spot where he was at the wards fell. The House [illegible] one day was awfully and all on each hour, and it happened that, after all the other members had left the hall, Mr. Adams and myself were left alone in our seats, engaged in [illegible] correspondence. Presently the messenger came in rather unceremoniously to clean up the hall, and began to wield that inexpressible implement, which is so often the plague of such [illegible] public and private affairs. [Laughter.]—Disturbed by the noise and dust, I observed Mr. Adams approaching me with an unfolded letter in hands.

"Do you know John J. Gurney?" said he.—"I know him well, sir, by reputation; but I did not have the pleasure of meeting him personally when he was in America." "Well, he has been a little more a letter, and I have been writing an answer. He has been calling me to account for my course on the Oregon question; and taking me to task for what he calls my belligerent spirit towards Mexico, towards England. And I should like to read you what I have written in reply."

And then, with the old man eloquent proceeded to read to me his letter, which was finished, one of the most interesting letters I ever read or heard in my life. It was a letter of autobiography, in which he described his parentage and early life, and in which he particularly alluded to the sacrifices from which he declined the [illegible] of Great Britain, [illegible] to [illegible] to blood, which—as he thought and as we were then soliciting American friends. He said that he was old enough at 13 to remember and what his father was about to [illegible] and that he ascribed the lessons which he [illegible] during his father's absence, to the Congress of Independence. [illegible] he said, after giving his prayers to God, he was required to repeat those exquisite [illegible] which he had carefully transcribed in the letter, and which he recited to me with an expression and energy which I shall never forget. He came to [illegible] and then choked with emotion:

"When Freedom's foes who sink to rest
In all their vain species blest?
When tyranny, united by Farewell,
Resists to defend a [illegible]
Or the [illegible] sweeter call
Than Peace when we [illegible]

Rise and shear [illegible] rains
In [illegible] their dirge is sung:
Then honor comes, pilgrim [illegible]
To [illegible] their [illegible] chu.
And Freedom shall a while repair
To dwell a weeping hermit there."

As I threw my manuscript by the same arm [illegible], which he said he was obliged to [illegible] as a part of this same morning exercise—the sale, I believe, on the earth of Col. Charles Ball, in the action of Lundary, one verse of which, with a slight variation, would not be inapplicable to our own Revolution:

"Oppressed Schuyler's dauntless [illegible]
He saw their cross shall bless the grave
Where [illegible] sound
What [illegible] the village bound
Withberry escorted our child kind,
And Wayne protect the shade."

I suppose, was the intention of at least one of our Massachusetts celebrators of that day. And they did not suppose that all mothers of 1775 were like Mrs. Adams, and the vast majority of them, we all know, had no antipathy and repugnance, not much passion, and their children were brought up not in the fear and admonition of the Lord and of Liberty.

Indeed, sir, I have at my side at this instant, a living illustration of the fact. Here is my venerable friend, Dr. Waldo, of Peppercell, who has come out here to celebrate his 83d birth day, and has just told me that on the morning of the 19th of April, 1775, he was employed at his father's house in Cambridge—being then about five years old—in pouring powder into cartridges for the American soldiers."

Father Mathew's Farewell.

The venerable apostle of Temperance is it for the active field on the Pacific week before last. The steam papers contain a very interesting account of his visit to Cork, but notice cannot ourselves to make room for it, but must content ourselves with a part. After expressing his heartfelt thanks that he has been instrumental in adding 600,000 names to his list of temperance pledges, and his gratitude to Henry Clay, Messrs. Corcoran, Gilmer, Collins, Miss Catherine Hayes, and others, he thus addresses his countrymen in America:

To my own beloved countrymen I most affectionately tender a few words of parting advice.—You have, my dearly beloved friends, relinquished the land of your birth, endeared to you by a thousand fond remembrances, to seek you there distant shores that compensation for industry and toil too often denied you at home. You are presented here with a boundless field of profitable employment, and every inducement held out to persevering industry. Your are received and welcomed into the great American family with feelings of sympathy, kindness and friendship.

After a few years you become citizens of this great people, [illegible] to [illegible] extent abound in all the [illegible] of moral, [illegible] life and conduct in wealth, the means of honest [illegible] are liberally thrown open to you and your children, and no impediment save of your own creation exists to prevent you obtaining the highest social and civil distinction; and will you any [illegible] those glorious opportunities to [illegible] improve, or rather, will you not, by studious [illegible] and acquiring habits suited to your new position, [illegible] to [illegible] the land of your adoption? [illegible] and [illegible] to [illegible] and [illegible] to elevated [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]
